

I am a resident of Indiana, which has a telephone privacy law. This is a wonderful law. We used to receive a couple of calls each night, and now our phone only rings when friends/family call. Telephone privacy laws should be handled on a state by state basis. Residents of each state may have varying levels of tolerance for calls, based, for example on the number of residents in that state employed by outbound call centers. A federal law that could weaken Indiana's existing telephone privacy law would be counter productive to the residents of Indiana. Thank you for considering my comments.
